Abstract

Both Jiang Gui's The Whirlwind and Yang Mo's Song of Youth are kind of Bildungsroman which describe its main character's awareness after a trial journey. Moreover, both of them viewed each other as the root of disorder and regarded themselves as the "saviour" at the same time. However, the winner and the loser have different explanation about history-one is focus on the present and the other is focus on future. The Chinese Communist Party which focuses on the present views history as an inevitable result of evolution. But the Kuomintang which focus on the future takes the cyclic view of history that consider things always revert themselves after reaching an extreme and the legitimacy of Confucianism will win in the long run. In addition, this paper seeks to answer the following questions: How to analyze the narratives of "women" and "people" appropriated constantly in these novels? Are they sublime subjects in the revolution history or the objects which are gazed and otherized? Or are they just false model writings for propaganda under party-state system? This paper also employs a meta-analysis way to explore the contemporary meaning in these writings.

Keywords: Anti-Communist novel, revolution and the historical Novel, representation of history, Jiang Gui, Yang Mo
